aim of Gerghis was literally the conquest of the world-as he conceived it-and was nearer i's accomplishment in his own life and in that of two of his descendants, Kublai and Timur, than it had ever been before, or is likely to be again. The empire which he created counted within its limits probably one half of the whole human race, and extended from the Sea of Okhotsk, at the northeastern extremity of Asia, over the whole breadth of the continent, as far as the Black Sea. Iosane as such ambition seems, it must have its source in some per ential springs of action common to our nature, sioco it constantly reappears with a certain periodicity in successive ages-fortunately far apart-and in races still more widely separated by thungraphic characters and surrounding conditions. Assyraio, Babylonian and Persian, Greek, Roman and French, hava each in turn sent forth beroes on this quest for universal empire. With the R mans alone it became the insanity of smbition of a people, who for successive ages s ught to be the rulers of the world, and actually founded an imperial eway over Europe, from the Rhine to the Danube, and in Asia and Africa nearly as far as Alexander had penetrated on either continent. The whole of Asia and Eastern Europe had not, however, been under the sceptre of a single suler until Timur swooped from his Mongolian steppes, the heir of the first Great Mogul, and encamped in the heart of Hungary and Poland, with a mixed multitude of tribes and nations for his army .- Fortnightly Review.
